I saked Mr. Spofford if there was nobody about the capitol who had been employed in the House twenty-five years ago. I thought it strange if there were none, considering with what devotion people hang on to public office. Mr. Spofford said that he knew of none unless it was Mr. Barclay, journal clerk of the House. The Mexican war had just been closed and peace established by the treaty of Guadalape Hidalgo. Of couse we felt very grateful to our generals. Everybody wanted to do something for them. An obscure man from Tennesece, I think, named Chase, wanted to introduce a resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Generals Twiggs, Worth, Pillow, Shields, Quitman, Patterson, Pierce, Smith and Oadwallader. I see by this old journal (holding a book in his hand) that he moved to suspend the rules in order to introduce the resolution. "Who were in the house, Mr. Barclay?"

"Why were in the house, Mr. Barclay?"

"Why, Lincoln was a member of that House, and Long John Wentworth. They were a handsome pair, I can assure you. It would take a dozen such to fill a suit of clothes. Long John was very thin theer, he's grounded up since. It was great sport for the young clerk's to see them together. Half the southern members thought they were the medium specimens of Illinois civilization. Neither of them was regarded as a possessing any great ability, and neither was to my know.

A SINGULAR SUICIDE.

Mr. Barclay told me of a very singular case of suicide which occurred at the capital tollowing the work and the suicide which occurred at the capital tollowing months after the impressive death of the "old man eloquant." There had for some time been employed in the House an asc. stant doork speer, named Charles W. Staart. On the following Friday he was borne by his friends and fellow-workers to his grave in Kensal Green Cemetery, and laid by the grave of his old schoolmate Thackersy.

Leech seemed to have been entirely his own teacher. Bearing this in mind, his caracter for portraying every subsent, and capacity for portraying every subject, and has accuracy of delineation are marvellous.
